Dear Mr. Foulds:

It has been over a year and half since you stopped working on my case. I have settled my invoices in full, but it seems you (or, your firm) didn't like the idea that I paid by instalments.

In order to get the case moving, I am making you the following offer: I will give you a percentage of the final settlement, which should be much more than what you would earn on hourly basis. After all, National Post's lawyer has already indicated to you, during my examination for discovery, that they were prepared to settle this case out of court. If this offer is unacceptable to you, I will continue to pay your fees as before, and for your peace of mind, I will sign a contract stating that your outstanding invoices will first be deducted from future settlement—before I see a penny.

As a result of the media crusade that National Post waged on me, I have spent more than $100,000.00 on legal fees, over $70,000.00 of which in relation to National Post. I have suffered a great deal of psychological pain, as well. In short, I have endured too much to abandon this lawsuit. I hope you appreciate that.

Sincerely,

Nega Mezlekia

P.S. Enclosed is a copy of my new book and a couple of reviews. I assume, like the rest of us, you enjoy reading novels from time to time.
