David,

This is quite possibly the last time I am writing you as your client. I urge you to consider your answer very carefully, as it could have far reaching consequences.

Since retaining you as a counsel five years ago, I have known nothing but frustrations and endless humiliation. As my numerous correspondences would indicate, I grovelled before you, having shed all human dignity. I begged you to provide me with the most basic service, although I have been paying you handsomely and, for the last nine months, in advance, too.

You now have the answers to the undertakings--the last remaining piece. Yet, you are still reluctant to schedule the court date. On July 10, I wrote you two emails asking you to do so; three days later, I have yet to hear from you.

Are you, or aren't you, going to stop this endless procrastination and schedule the trial date? If the answer is 'yes', I would like to know how soon you intend to do that. If, on the other hand, your answer is 'no', or if your schedule is measured in months, I don't want to hear your reasons. You will give your explanation to your colleagues and partners, as I am going to hold Davis LLP responsible for your intolerable conduct, not you.

The entire world will see how shabbily I have been treated by a law firm that brags its "reputation for excellence and ethical practice" has earned it the "highest peer review".

The years of humiliation I have suffered under Davis LLP, the degradation and neglect I have endured, makes a sickening reading. It will resonate among many people. And once my plight becomes public, I am confident, many more individuals will come forward to share their own horror stories; the thin facade of respectability that Davis LLP wore for more than a century will finally crumble.

I will devote the rest of my life to making sure that no one else suffers my fate. And despite the appearance of mismatch, the looming battle against Davis LLP is something that I can wage from, say, Somalia and win at little cost to myself.

I had hoped to avoid this crisis. But a man can only beg and grovel so much, and after five gruelling years, I have reached my limit.

In the short term, I will look for a more accountable counsel. I am prepared to endure the initial financial sacrifice and other ramifications. But before taking any of these measures, I will await your response.

Please provide me your answer in writing, so there is no misunderstanding.
